Setting new standards for health promotion, disease prevention and public health ethics at Minority-Serving Institutions worldwide

BUILDING BLOCKS If You Can't Cite It, Don't Write It: The Emergence of Plagiarism in the 21st Century By: Monique Thomas Florida A&M University – Tallahassee, Florida

Abstract

In 2014, Senator John Walsh of Montana had his master's degree rescinded by the Army War College because he plagiarized his thesis. His actions led to him dropping out his state's 2014 senate race (Martin, 2014). More recently, Dr. Ben Carson, a potential 2016 Republican presidential candidate, has been accused of plagiarizing sections of his book, America the Beautiful: Rediscovering What Makes This Nation Great. In response to numerous written and online news releases, Carson issued an apology stating, "I attempted to appropriately cite and acknowledge all sources in America the Beautiful, but inadvertently missed some. I apologize, and I am working with my editors to rectify the situation" (Bradner, 2015). This lack of ethical integrity, intentional or unintentional, affects grades, professions, reputations, and knowledge progression, but many professionals and scientists still commit it. This essay describes pitfalls and solutions in this very serious infraction that can undermine integrity and acceptance of public information particularly in health promotion and disease prevention.

Suggested Citation:

Thomas, Monique, "If You Can't Cite It, Don't Write It: The Emergence of Plagiarism in the 21st Century", International Journal of Ethnic College Health, Vol. 1, No. 2, p. 33-35.

The International Journal of Ethnic College Health is a peer-reviewed electronic journal and repository of excellence in health promotion and disease prevention at Minority-Serving Institutions worldwide published by the Institute for Successful Leadership, Inc. Full articles are available solely for subscribers to the publication at www.THEISL4Uonline.com, and distribution/reprinting without consent of the Institute of Successful Leadership, Inc. is prohibited.